

Edel — Learning Disabled Specialist

I would want to be a learning disabled child for an hour. We take learning for granted; for example, the acquisition of reading. Our approach to teaching these exceptional students would be greatly enhanced if we could view life through their eyes.

Sandra Kennedy — Crafts/Health

I would have been Isadore Duncan when she first danced on stage. She danced with a freedom of expression never before seen which later became an accepted art form: modern dance.

In Biblical history I would have liked to have been Eve during the hour prior to temptation for four reasons: 1. I would have been happy. 2. I wouldn't have had to worry about what to wear in the morning. 3. I might have spared future generations from the somewhat misogynic view of women as the originator of sin (the archetypal femme fatale). And 4. This might have enabled us to come a long way, Baby, a lot faster.

Michael Kennedy — Calculus/Trig/Algebra

Ray Killian (Wolfang) — Band/Chorus

I would like to have been J. S. Bach. To me, he was the foremost composer, lyricist, and musician. Bach wrote both for the church, and the courts, but in all things he believed God was the originator. I like that philosophy.

Linda Larson — English

I would want to be René Descartes during that hour early in the morning of Nov. 10, 1619 when he had the brilliant flash of insight which fueled his 30 years of incomparable intellectual effort. It is the consequence of his dream of the new future of all sciences which led Phillip Davis and Reuben Hersch to conclude: "That hour marked the beginning of the modern world."
